

Monday, March 24, 2008

Japan peers into the abyss

By BRAD GLOSSERMAN

HONOLULU — It is an item of faith for many Japanese — and many Japan watchers — that their country will never build or acquire nuclear weapons. Japan's nonnuclear status, a product of both the searing experience of August 1945 and a calculation of the strategic value of nuclear weapons, has been a pillar of the nation's postwar political identity. But recent developments could force Japan to reconsider the nuclear option. The United States must engage Japanese decision-makers in a discussion of their security concerns and work to allay them. Failure to do so could push Tokyo over the nuclear brink.

Japan's status as the only atom-bombed nation made any discussion of nuclear weapons highly charged. An education system dominated by the left used the nation's history to reinforce pacifism and to subtly critique a conservative foreign policy that relied on the U.S. for national security. The result was a virtual taboo that headed off any discussion of nuclear weapons. Japanese politicians who even suggested that it might make sense for Japan to have a nuclear weapons capability were ostracized or punished.

In fact, however, there was a rational and calculated examination of the nuclear option in Japan. In keeping with the sensitivity of the issue, studies were conducted at arms length — usually by academics reporting to government bodies — so as not to lend an official appearance.

These all concluded that the nuclear option made no sense for Japan. The country had no strategic depth and was therefore vulnerable to a second strike; it would undermine Japan's diplomatic standing as it would repudiate a pillar of the country's postwar diplomacy; acquisition of nuclear weapons would create regional instability and increase suspicions about Japan; and it would damage, if not rupture, the alliance with the U.S., contributing to Japan's political isolation in the region. In short, a very real cost-benefit analysis contributed to Japan's nonnuclear status.

That calculus may be changing. Recent changes in the regional security environment are pushing Japanese security planners to re-examine the nuclear option. There appears to be the start of a debate about having a nuclear debate, but there's no mistaking the unease about developments and their implications for Japan's national security.

One concern is the U.S.-India civilian nuclear cooperation agreement. Japanese worry because the deal appears to reward bad behavior (India hasn't ratified the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty); it could set a precedent that would encourage other countries to proliferate; and it appears to downplay the significance of the NPT, making it just another item in the U.S. diplomatic tool kit, to be discarded when

Book A Hotel room online

Compare hotel prices from over 120 top websites and save up to 70%.

Hotels.SideStep.com

All book hotel online room Deals

Save up to 70% on special deals to book hotel online room at Yahoo Travel.

travel.yahoo.com

...plus
A FREE GIFT!

英語転職なら
Career Forumの DISCO
外資系に強い
人材紹介会社

State of art free bilingual service for car buyers MyToyota.jp

 A new chapter begins
for Books Kinokuniya
in New York

Japan Info Guide Links for living in Japan

- Housing
Tokyo Serviced Apartments + Rentals
See our ongoing campaigns! Now up to 15% off!
- Driving
Your key to buying a car in Tokyo
My Toyota helps you into the driver's seat
- Dining
O's Table Tokyo-Ikuta
Premium Kobe beef grilled to perfection

Poll Most read stories Editors' picks

A piece of your mind
Back to the mound

Japan's baseball season starts again this week. Who's your pick for the pennant this year?

- Even without Trey Hillman, the Ham Fighters will be the team to beat.
- The Dragons: Last year's champions are back, in tact, and with Kazuhiro Wada added to the line-up.
- Takahiro Arai should push the Hanshin Tigers over the top this season.
- Bobby Valentine's Marines are primed to finish the job this year.
- If this is Sadaharu Oh's last season, the Hawks will want to send him off with a big win.
- The Giants: You can't bet against a team with all-stars in every position.

geopolitics dictate, rather than the cornerstone of the nonproliferation regime.

Security planners in Tokyo worry that Pyongyang is closely watching those negotiations and using them as a benchmark for its own multilateral talks. (Delhi insists its experience is unique and any deal will not set a precedent.) Shifts in U.S. policy — such as its readiness to talk directly to the North Koreans, to roll back financial sanctions and to move forward with normalization even though Japanese concerns about the fate of its abductees have not been met — harden Japanese fears that the U.S. will make similar compromises when it comes to denuclearizing the Korean Peninsula and that Washington may settle for a "gray" nuclear capability in the North — neither confirmed nor denied.

While reluctant to say so out loud, Japanese are especially worried that a reunified Korea — even headed by the South — would retain that nuclear capability. Japanese are well aware of the animosity that colors its relationship with South Korea and wonder: What would the U.S. do in the event of a conflict between its two Northeast Asian allies?

China is an equally troubling issue. Japan's confidence was sapped by the "lost decade" of the 1990s; China rose as Japan stagnated. There is a deep-rooted fear that the U.S. will reassess "the most important bilateral relationship in the world, bar none," and seek a great power condominium with Beijing. The close consultation with China in the six-party talks is seen as a harbinger of the future.

Nuclear dynamics contribute to the uncertainty. In the Cold War, the U.S. accepted mutual vulnerability with the Soviet Union to create strategic stability. Both superpowers knew that in a crisis each could inflict unacceptable damage on the other; that provided the foundation for stability through mutual deterrence.

The U.S. and China have not reached a similar arrangement. The U.S. might decide that it won't accept mutual vulnerability with China and would counter Chinese attempts to create such a relationship. That would threaten an arms race and could create regional instability. But if the U.S. accepts vulnerability to Chinese missiles — China's ability to strike the U.S. in a crisis — there will be doubts in Japan about Washington's readiness to trade Los Angeles for Tokyo. Neither outcome is satisfactory for Tokyo.

Collectively, these developments contribute to growing unease in Tokyo about the credibility of the U.S. commitment to defend Japan. And those doubts, rather than any nationalist sentiment or discontent with Japan's international status, will be the drivers of and the most important factors in Japanese national security debates about nuclear weapons.

What options does Japan have? It could decide to build a nuclear weapon, but all the countervailing considerations outlined previously still apply. Going nuclear is not in Japan's national interest.

Missile defense is another option, and Japan has deployed Patriot missiles and Aegis-equipped destroyers. But this technology is still young and most governments see it as part of a multilayered defense strategy.

A complement to passive defenses is a conventional offensive strike capability that would allow Tokyo to destroy threats before they reach Japan. Tokyo has shunned such capabilities even though lawmakers conceded 50 years ago that they are constitutionally permissible. Defense specialists consider this an increasingly attractive option after the North Korean missile and nuclear tests. Such capabilities would likely be destabilizing and elevate concerns about Japanese intentions, however. The possibility of a preemptive strike could raise a potential adversary's readiness to use its own forces, fearing that it had to "use em or lose em."

A third option is abandoning one of Japan's three nonnuclear principles (which prohibit the production, possession or introduction of nuclear weapons on Japanese soil). It has been suggested that the

VOTE

Total Votes : 413

View past polls

Most blogged stories on JTO

1. School offers costume-play way to 'cool' English
View blogs link to this story
2. 'Mochi' moffles reinvent the waffle
View blogs link to this story
3. Gaming contest adds Dutch style to Japanese knowhow
View blogs link to this story

POWERED BY  Technorati JAPAN

U.S. station nuclear weapons in Japan, ensuring a stronger coupling of U.S. and Japanese interests. Japanese strategists are beginning to explore this option, although it is politically impossible at this time.

Japan is increasingly insecure, and that insecurity reflects doubts about the U.S. commitment to Japan's defense. A decision to go nuclear would be a clear sign that there is no faith in the U.S.

U.S. policymakers are waking up to the growing uncertainty at the heart of the alliance, but repeated assurances of the U.S. commitment to the alliance — while welcome — aren't enough. The U.S. needs frank and candid discussions with Japanese about the roots of their insecurity, how the nuclear deterrent works, and measures that can be taken to build Japanese confidence. This conversation would demonstrate U.S. seriousness about Japanese concerns and show respect for an ally by sharing information vital to its defense.

While possession of nuclear weapons appears unnecessary and unwise given current circumstances, a nuclear debate would still be in Japan's interest. It would help Japanese better understand the reasons for not acquiring such weapons and reconfirm Japan's nonnuclear status. It could help forge a national consensus as anxieties mount. The U.S. must be a partner in this process since its behavior and perceived reliability will be the most important factor in the Japanese debate.

Brad Glosserman is executive director of the Pacific Forum CSIS and a Japan Times contributing editor. The article originally appeared in PacNet Newsletter.

Online Language Exchange

Language Exchange Anytime, Anywhere Practice
Korean, Instantly/Easily
www.tt4you.com

Japanese Green Tea

Du Zhong Tea made in Japan Well for Diet, high blood pressure selectshop.jp-stores.com/goods.cgi?

Videos & Pictures

Relax and Watch a Video! 100% Free
100links.com/video

TONA: NYC Number in Japan

On Your Mobile Phone in Japan You're Connected by Local Rates.
www.tonazone.com

Ads by Google

We welcome your opinions. Click to send a message to the editor.

The Japan Times
(C) All rights reserved

About us | Work for us | Contact us | Privacy policy | Link policy | Registration FAQ

Advertise in japantimes.co.jp.

This site is optimized for viewing with Netscape, version 7.1 or Internet Explorer, version 6.0 or above.

The Japan Times Ltd. All rights reserved.

Back to top ▲