London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

That is where Hideyuki Uno scores big. He is one of the few, if not the only, Japanese takoyaki slingers in London. Just stepping through the door of his modestly sized shop, Juzu Izakaya, you can imagine that you've somehow feel right, he says.

“I was doing full-time jobs in an office or as a driver, but it didn't feel right,” he says. “I quit my job straight after we got married to

WEEK 3

Roll up! Roll up!

By DANIEL ROBSON

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“Almost 11 years ago, I went to Camden Market in north London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“Almost 11 years ago, I went to Camden Market in north London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“Almost 11 years ago, I went to Camden Market in north London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“I was doing full-time jobs in an office or as a driver, but it didn’t feel right,” he says. “I quit my job straight after we got married to

WEEK 3

Roll up! Roll up!

By DANIEL ROBSON

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“Almost 11 years ago, I went to Camden Market in north London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“I was doing full-time jobs in an office or as a driver, but it didn’t feel right,” he says. “I quit my job straight after we got married to

WEEK 3

Roll up! Roll up!

By DANIEL ROBSON

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“Almost 11 years ago, I went to Camden Market in north London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“I was doing full-time jobs in an office or as a driver, but it didn’t feel right,” he says. “I quit my job straight after we got married to

WEEK 3

Roll up! Roll up!

By DANIEL ROBSON

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

“Almost 11 years ago, I went to Camden Market in north London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.

The Japan Times

London, where there are tens of thousands of Japanese people living at any one time, it was always considered by the majority of the most Japanese food available in eateries there would hardly pass muster in its homeland.